Image 1 Copy: A Cloud of Witnesses

Caption: As parents, we need to acknowledge the fact that we need help. We need help to better understand our kids. We need help when it comes to certain issues. And we need other adults saying the same things we are saying so our kids hear about a relationship with God from people who are not us. What we need is an intergenerational cloud of witnesses helping our kids grow in their faith.

Image 2 Copy: Build Intergenerational Relationships

Caption: We should want our kids to be in an environment where they have the opportunity to meet, build relationships with, and learn from people of all ages. In church, this can sometimes naturally happen with Sunday school teachers or small group leaders. But imagine what would happen if we, as their parents, were more intentional about it.

Image 3 Copy: Fostering Intergenerational Discipleship

Caption: Look for opportunities to surround your kids with new, maybe older voices who can encourage them and model what having real faith looks like. My guess is that there are people in your church who might not teach or volunteer every week, but they can have a presence in your child's life that will make a real difference. It's your job to foster these kinds of relationships so that your child is in an environment where intergenerational discipleship happens.

Image 4 Copy: Building a Bigger Picture

Caption: Don't miss the power of a bigger picture of intergenerational discipleship. Do whatever you can to surround your kids with cool, young, hip leaders who they will fall in love with, but also surround them with older, more seasoned adults who can share a depth of faith that will have a tremendous impact on your children's future.
